The present Bachelor's thesis addresses the issues of Feminism in Mrs Dalloway, To the Lighthouse, Orlando and A Room of One's Own, by Virginia Woolf. Its author, Linda Dušková offers a complex, comprehensive, and logical insight in the topical focus of pivotal works of early 20th century Feminist movement.

The thesis clearly laid out: the first theoretical part consists of three chapters outlining the issues of the Victorian period, Feminism and Virginia Woolf's life and oeuvre. This is followed by a practical part where Dušková convincingly demonstrates her erudition in the field by applying the findings from theoretical works on the aforementioned four novels. Here, I feel the overall thesis might have profited from a narrower focus on two rather than four works, which makes the analysis overall rather shallower, yet still sufficiently comprehensive. Needless to say, the practical part, constituting the crux of the thesis, consists of an analysis still thoroughly executed with convincingly laid-out argumentation. The conclusions of the author's findings are clear, logical, and persuasively communicated with the support of complex and relevant sources.

The formal aspects of the thesis are by general standards. The language is appropriate, correct, and clear. I also appreciate the interconnectedness of chapters which the candidate has been able to achieve both by logical links and also fine use of transitions.

There appear truly only a few minor deviations from the use of punctuation with speech marks (e.g. different use in the bibliography). However, all these flaws appear utterly marginal to such a complex Bachelor's thesis.

Overall, the present thesis constitutes a respectable, well-refined, originally structured, clearly articulated piece of original research. The main advantage of the thesis is its complexity underpinned with clearly articulate findings.
